GENERAL HORACE PORTER CHOSEN CHAIRMAN-THE REMARKS OF GENERAL AMES AT THE LOYAL LEGION DINNER.

The veterans of New-York City had two exciting evenings last week. The first was at the annual lection of the Memorial Committee, held on Wednesday evening in the 69th Regiment Armory. About 175 members were present-a full attendance of the elected delegates. Two tickets were in the fieldone headed by General Horace Porter and the other by Civil Justice Joseph H. Stiner. The comrades who supported General Porter proposed to take the Memorial Committee out of politics. They think that there has been too much "ma chine" work going on in the Grand Army, and they called on General Porter, who, they knew, was opposed to political deals in veteran organizations, to lead the assault upon those who have been entrenched for some years in the committee offices. The victory was not quite so complete as the capture of Fort Fisher thirty-two years ago, but it was, on the whole, satisfactory. General Porter was elected chairman, and General Nicholas W. Day, of John A. Dix Post No. 125, treasurer. They each received 106 votes to 69 each for their opponents. The rest of the ticket was elected by the opposition. The vote for secretary stood: For Past Department Commander E. J. Atkinson, of H. B. Claffin Post No. 378, 91; for Past Department Commander James S. Fraser, of James C. Price Post No. 29, 85. This majority of six was the average gained by that part of the anti-Porter ticket elected, with the exception of anti-Porter ticket elected, with the exception of the office of grand marshal, to which place General James K. O'Beirne was chosen by forty-five majority over Captain John B. Hyde. The full ticket elected was as follows: Chairman, General Horace Porter; first vice-chairman. Joseph A. Gouldon; second vice-chairman, Edward Gilon; treasurer, General N. W. Day; secretary, Past Department Commander Edward J. Atkinson; corresponding secretary, Charles E. Forrest; grand marshal, General James R. O'Beirne; sergeant-at-arms, W. J. Barry, Although the opposition elected all save two of the officers, these two are the important ones of the Memorial Committee. General Porter will have the appointment of the standing committees for 1897, and he will be likely to select comrades who are committed to the work of reform.

The other exciting episode took place at the February dinner of the Loyal Legion on Wednesday evening at Delmonico's. More than 500 companions were present, and probably there was never held a more representative gathering of the commandery. General Horace Porter, the commander, presided, and after the dinner General A. A. Ames, now a citizen of Massachusetts, who was the guest of the commandery, read a carefully prepared paper on the taking of Fort Flaher. During the Red tion period General Ames was Governor and United States Senator in the State of Mississippi. Maps had been placed upon the wall of Delmonico's dining hall showing that part of the Atlantic coast and of North Carolina adjacent to the fort, with representations of the structure and its surroundings, giving an idea of the difficulties which had to be overcome by the land and naval forces of the United States. General Ames dealt with both the first expedition, December 24, 1864, which was commanded on the part of the Army by his father-inlaw, General Benjamin F. Butler, which was un-successful, and the second expedition, commanded by General Alfred H. Terry, three weeks later, which was victorious. Admiral Porter commanded the United States naval forces of both expeditions. General Ames's paper, purporting to delineate what occurred on those eventful days, attempted a readjustment of the laurels achieved in these battles. He made it appear that the Navy had received a great deal more credit than it deserved, and that General Butler had been unjustly blamed for the failure of the first expedition. General Ames said that General Terry in the second fight had turned over to him the entire command and direction of the land forces, and that every assault and movement which took place from 2:30 p. m. on January 15, 1865, until the fort was captured, six hours later, had been under his (Ames's) orders, thus stripping General Terry of much of the glory which had been accorded to him until the day of his death, half a dozen years ago. General Ames also proceeded to minimize the services of General Newton M. Curtis, now the member of Congress from the St. Lawrence district of this State. General Curtis was in both expeditions, each time commanding the first brigade of Ames's division, and has for many years borne the title of 'The Haro of Fort Fisher."

General Ames quoted from his own and many other military reports to show that General Curtis had been wounded (his right eye shot out by a shell from the fort) at 4:30 p. m. on January 15, one hour could therefore have had little part in the terrible from the fort) at 4:30 p. m. on January 15, one hour after the battle began, and that General Curtis could therefore have had little part in the terrible fighting which took place before the fort capitulated and the Confederates surrendered, at 9:30 p. m. General Curtis, who is a man of gigantic build, was present, and occupied a seat almost in the centre of the hall, and facing the speaker. He loomed up as he sat head and shoulders above the companions about him. There were also present other members of the order, belonging to both the Army and the Navy, who had taken part in the battle. General Curtis is one of the best-known members of the commandery, and there are few more popular companions. From the first the greatest interest was manifested by the entire assemblage in General Ames's new-found material, but when the General undertook to detract from General Curtis's fame, and even assailed General Badeau's narrative of the fight in his "Life of Grant," which gave great credit to Curtis, there were distinct and increasing murmurs of disapproval. An excited veteran arose and cailed for "three cheers for General Curtis" which were given, and repeated. Some impetuous members wanted General Curtis to get up at once and take issue with the views expressed by General Ames. But the Congressman only smiled imperturbably and said, "One at a time." When General Ames had finished there was a tremendous call for "Curtis" coming from every part of the house.

And when the General arose to his full height of 6 feet 6 he had a reception such as has seldom been witnessed at a meeting of veterans of the war. He made an impassioned address, in which he called in question many of General Ames's declarations, but added: "This is not the time, though it is the place, to present my side of the case. I will do that at some future meeting of this commandery if I am allowed the privilege, and I think I will be able to show you how much of misrepresentation and how little of fact there are in some of General then launched into a de

He was arrested at 19 o'clock on Satur-day night on a Broadway cable-car at Thirtyeighth-st. by Policeman Swartout, of the West Thirtieth-st. station, on the complaint of the conductor, W. H. Sanford, According to the state-ment of Sanford, Guion boarded the car at Thirtycar, one of them, like Mr. Guion, demanding a car, one of them, like Mr. Guion, demanding a seat before he paid his fare. The conductor told the man to sit next the commercial traveller. Guion protested that there was no teem, and that if the man sat down at all it would be in his (Guion's) lap. A heated argument followed, and finally ended in Sanford calling Policeman Swartout and insisting that Guion be locked up on a charge of disorderly conduct.

Yesterday morning, when before Magistrate Deuel, Sanford was unable to give a comprehensive account of what really happened on the car. The Court accordingly addictined the examination until to-morrow. Guion was in the mean time paroled upon his own recognizance.

The committee has in view, as a model, the jail at Hartford, Conn. To follow out this plain, the present structure in this village would have to be heightened one story, the old stone cells taken out, and the interior refitted with steel cells and corridors. The cost is estimated at from $20,000 to $20,000, and several concerns have been asked to submit bids. Nevertheless, there is a strong feeling in this village that a new jail or penitentiary should be built outside of the corporation limits and the presence of an institution of this kind in the heart of the community done away with entirely.

THE ACADEMY'S NEW SITE.

GREATER SENTIMENT IN FAVOR OF IT THAN WAS EXPECTED.

Regarding the advantages of the site on Amsterdam-ave., between One-hundred-and-ninth and One-hundred-and-tenth sts., purchased by the National Academy of Design, and the plans of the Academy for the future, James D. Smille, the treasurer, said yesterday to a Tribune reporter:

"The meeting on Wednesday night, at which the vote was taken, was much stronger in its expression of sentiment in favor of the One-hundred and-tenth-st, movement than was expected by its friends. The vote, when opened and counted at the subsequent meeting of the Committee on Site and Plan, proved to be forty for One-hundred-and-tenth-st, sixteen for Fifty-seventh-st, and one for neither, so that those who favor the One hundred-and-tenth-st, site feel encouraged to be lieve that the opponents are neither so many nor so determined as it was feared they might be Every expression now points to harmonious ac-

"Some have thought that the going of the Academy to One-hundred-and-tenth-st. would be an abandonment of the field, and they have said that the field so abandoned would surely be occupied by the Society of American Artists. But that can hardly be a well-grounded fear, inasmuch as in the first place there is no field aban-doned, and in the next place the two institutions are active on lines so different that one cannot take the place of the other. The best interests of art make it desirable that those two institutions should be meintained in vigorous operation.

"Forty years ago the Academy bought the lots at Twenty-third-st, and Fourth-ave., a strong opposition holding that the site was too far uptown. It was some years before the ground was built upon, and now, thirty years after the open-ing of those galleries, we find they are too far downtown, and those who have urged the movement to One-hundred-and-tenth-st. find, as theh essors did, an opposition who insist that it is too far uptown. But it is hoped that time will prove that that opposition has no better founda tion than had the opposition to the Twenty-third-st. site. The difficulty of finding a site having the requirements demanded by the Academy can hardly be overestimated, and the institution may now be congratulated upon having secured a site now be congratulated upon having secured a site that, in size and location, makes possible the most destrable results. It is as yet too early to speak of plans. It is probable that there will be some sort of competition. A scheme covering the entire plot will be evolved, aithough there is no probability that such a scheme would be carried out at once, but rather, as in the case of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History, it would be a matter of successive buildings. It would necessarily involve galleries, schools and administrative department. The schools, or school accommodations, might be erected at once. The galleries and the home of the Academy might be built later, as the Academiclans might decide. The entire group might involve large expenditures, much in excess of the means now at the command of the Academy. But there is every reason to believe that with so

On reaching the parlor floor she dis-covered the front door ajar and informed her employer. Harry Hall, son of the owner of the house ran upstairs to investigate. On the landing on th second floor he encountered Edwards. He saw the negro running with Hall in pursuit and joined in the chase. In his flight the fugitive threw away a leather cardense containing fifty 10-cent pieces. When in front of No. 21 West Seventy-fourth-st., he tossed a gold watch upon the porch. On reaching the next house he threw a purse with 50 under the steps. The articles were recovered. Edwards was caught at Seventy-fourth-st, and Eighth-ave, and locked up. He was recognized as a well-known crook, now under indictment for a burglary committed on December 17, 1892, under the name of James W. Hammet.

When Edwards was arraigned in Yorkville Cour yesterday morning he demanded an examination, and Magistrate Brann committed him in $3,000 ball for examination to-morrow.
